The Garmin 820 lets you use your smartphone as an external GPS receiver, letting you track your friends and family even when they're not near an external GPS device. On top of that, it also boasts an awesome feature set that we've never seen before from Garmin -- it's an awesome GPS receiver. "Please tell me you've come up with a way of using the watch that we are wearing as a battery and charging device for the phones we use daily" The Garmin watch is a watch to the phone. If you're trying to make your phone into a phone by putting a touchscreen on it, there is nothing that's going to be able to replace what you're getting from the iPhone, Android phone, or Windows phone. It's a mobile device that you're going to charge every night, and for most people, that's going to mean a mobile phone and not some small screen-enabled device with no camera. Yeah, so it's true, and that's what makes the dealbreaker for me. I would not use it as a cell phone. I don't want my phone on my wrist, and I don't want to charge it every night. (I already carry a cell phone, and all of my data plans have unlimited data, so that's not an issue for me). But there's a difference between watching and recording. For example, when someone is using streaming video, they can either watch it or record it. When someone is watching Netflix, they can either watch it on their television or on their computer. But recording is different. You can't switch from watching to recording. You have to watch and then record, and when you record, it's gone. Don't get me wrong, I think the Garmin Watch is a nice idea, but the camera really isn't anything new and really, most of us (including me) own a camera or two anyway. I guess it's worth pointing out that the most useful feature of the Watch is actually the heart rate monitor, and it works surprisingly well for real-time stats. It is a neat feature, and I'll admit that in some ways it's a lot better than a dedicated camera. But to get the most out of the Watch, it really doesn't do anything different than my regular camera.
